

Difference between Addiction and Desire

Posted by musicman - 25 May 2011 20:23

---

I'm sure this has been discussed before, but I've been thinking about it.

The more stories I read on this heilig website, the more I realize that I may not be as bad off as I thought. I don't suffer from hyper-sexuality (extremely easily triggered), I don't get unreasonably "needy" when in a public place or other brazenly inappropriate situation to act out. Sure, I haven't gone a whole week without M in, say, 8 years, but somehow that feels someone benign compared to the other stories I've read here. So, my question is: Am I really addicted, or do I simply have issues with self-control? Or maybe there's just different levels of addiction, and I just don't have a heavy addiction.

I always thought that the definition of an addict is someone who acts on an urge even when he knows that the action is ultimately destructive and counter-intuitive.

=====

Re: Difference between Addiction and Desire

Posted by Gevura Shebyesod - 01 Jul 2015 17:36

---

cordnoy wrote:

howbout

If your wife wants

pickles

I'm sure I'll get some awesome answers from you guys

---

=====

=====

Re: Difference between Addiction and Desire

Posted by cordnoy - 01 Jul 2015 17:48

---

Gevura Shebyesod wrote:

cordnoy wrote:

howbout

If your wife wants

pickles

Then, I would climb mountains, scale walls, ford rivers, splash loudly through streams, devour lions, tear apart enemy combatants, smash doors.....

Warning: Spoiler!

=====

=====

Re: Difference between Addiction and Desire
Posted by stillgoing - 02 Jul 2015 16:12

---

cordnoy

howbout pickles?

reallygettingthere

that would just mean that you're pregnant

Zemmy's signature

The reason I'm acting as if I'm pregnant, is because I'm expecting. I should be accepting.

~TZ

=====

=====