Shalom,

This one is to look back to find the inner lights HaShem's gave me to get out of the abyss. Settle down all my journey, strengthen my future self and perhaps help someone out there.

The fallen diamond

A diamond falls calmly through the winding streams, he does not see himself as a diamond, more like a pasted rock, covered in his fears. As he falls, he observes everything with a clarity that is not alien to him. How much time is left to reach the bottom? he wonders, as he effortlessly sinks in.

The end may never come, but coming out seems even more intimidating than the wait.

As he falls, he radiates light in gloomy places, around him they are fearfully astonished, they still in their darkness, still in their fears, still in their burdens seek a way to come back afloat.

They are afraid of losing hope when they see a stronghold succumb to the foreign storm, which they are not unaware of, they are in a hostile place, the only thing they can see is a bright light like a distant point in the heights which they want to reach. The diamond, however, just keeps falling, the view of it having been clouded. His burden is so great that the darkness is indifferent to him.

The rock finally reached its limit, filling his being with tranquility. His light went out with him, his brightness finally dimmed, his potential faded, his light radiance obstructed with his anxieties, fears and confused thoughts. FAILURE !

He failed this time, the glowing light seems to be very far away, even that the bright light manages to go down to the depths of the gloom to illuminate, once it reaches its precious jewel He revives its original brightness, propelling it to the top of the depths of the abyss faster than he descended...
