

which path to take? jewish vs non-jewish?

Posted by mnman415 - 18 Aug 2010 16:42

when i walk to shul there are 2 paths both of equal distance. on the one path (starting at the corner of my block) there are a couple families of goyim who dress like goyim. she/they wear the "shorts" that cover maybe an inch of the leg and depending on the day, a pretty revealing T-shirt of any kind of revealing shirt. the youngest is probably 13 and the oldest is prob 15. (a couple families). pretty enticing, right? then once i pass that corner of the street from there until shul its very possible for any other female to be within my sight (even though i try to look down....its hard to stop yourself from glancing) on the other hand i can walk down the other path which (in my mind) is not used by as many people (based on the geography of my city) but to get to that path on my block there is a very frum family which happens to have 10 girls (OY VAY) they are very frum they wear tznius clothes with skirts dragging on the floor (maybe a bit exaggerated) but they go to their shoes. so maybe this path is better? except very frum girls turns me on (besides the fact that i want to marry a very very frum girl in a couple years im 16 now so when im ready for shidduchim i want a very very frum girls cus i view myself as very frum, at least i try to be but thats a whole separate shmooz in 4 or 5 years) but the very frum and tznius girls really really turns me especially with the tznius way of dressing.

so if it better for me to walk down the first path and take a risk of seeing the immodestly dressed goy and seeing her skin (in her shorts and shirt) and possibly seeing other people as well? or is it better to walk the 2nd path and seeing the frum family? does looking at jews VS non-jews make a diff? and this is all just in case i lose control of myself and looking at them instead of the ground.....

=====
=====