ZS, I found this:

“When the sun is low on the horizon in the morning and evening, it causes objects to cast two shadows, a dark one [closer to the object] and a lighter one [farther from the object]. The lighter one is referred to as the ‘shadow of the shadow’” Artscroll Gittin 66a (2) note 25.

So scientifically they have no umbra but do have a penumbra.

OR,

for those that don't believe in them, it can also mean that it could seem so real in your dream that you think it's real.

This is a bit heavy for this thread, me thinks, goes a little too high over my head.

aside for the penumbra, there's also the umbrella, of a similar nature. When the sun is covered by rainclouds that rain forth rain, the umbrella opens up, thereby casting an enumbra AND penumbra on it's holder-psychochemistry, 101.

thanks you very much for that info.

i still do not understand, why would one shadow be considered a shadow of a shadow, they are two separate shadows, not a shadow generated by another shadow.

additionally, why would sheidim cast one shadow and not the other?

That message says you're an anav.

The fine print says you're trying to get attention.

hi.
