

Shalom Aleichem

Posted by chico - 02 Dec 2024 23:34

Hi guys,I was in SA for about a year. I recently took a break when I took in a new job and did some traveling. I had some time to reflect, and I realized that my time in SA was really intense and I experienced significant lows being in the program. I benefited a ton from the community aspect in terms of self-acceptance and honesty. However, the community itself, or at least the one I was in, produced a lot of shame and fear mongering. Everything became strictly about sobriety and how many days you had and it was pretty brutal to share at a meeting that your date had changed. I had a sponsor who would meet me with disappointment whenever I would have a fall. I did get longer streaks than I ever have achieved before, but I was also fairly miserable during them. I suffered a few episodes of severe depression and intense shame as I couldn't seem to fit into the SA model.

While I was traveling, I practiced a lot of self love. I worked with my mashpia to make a contract with myself to remind myself that I am a happy, responsible, and valuable person whenever I have a temporary down. Every Monday and Thursday night I farbreng with the contract for at least a half hour, and I also do a lot of journaling and gratitude.

I'm done traveling and working my temporary job, and I would like to start working a program again. I have serious reservations about returning to SA. I have tried doing the GYE courses on my own and I usually stop after a week or so when the inspiration runs out. I definitely need some accountability, and I want to also have that community feel. Maybe having a partner with to work the courses together would help...I would appreciate some advice on this matter.
