“The battle against desire is an enormous challenge. It feels so overwhelming. Yet we can succeed. We can change ourselves to the point that it will be easy for us to control ourselves. We will be excited to clobber the yetzer hara. We will live on such a high.

But no matter how strong we become, there will be times when we will need determination and willpower. Sometimes we will have to rely on our feelings that sin is wrong and that we don't do that. Even if our desires seem to have weakened, we never know what unexpected challenge we will need these weapons for. To stay on top, we must develop each strategy and use it when necessary.”

Some important counterarguments to the yetzer hara's sales pitch. The more we think about them when not challenged, the more likely that we think about them when challenged.

“This is the way to live a thrilling life. Forget about the great experiences that await us in the next world; this is the best life in this world!”

“If I run after this pleasure, what will I be left with? I will have nothing. But if I win, I will have something valuable forever and my life will be exciting!”

Chapter 36: Pages 279-281

Staying Away: A Rational Approach

I really love this chapter. Instead of the approach I grew up experiencing, which was moral and religious guilt and fire-and-brimstone if you don't figure out how to make it impossible for you to ever see anything bad, the author takes a rational approach on the subject, showing why it doesn't make sense to expose ourselves to garbage.

This chapter is a real eye-opener! It should be on the front page of GYE – and in every yeshiva!
